"Low Man on a Pogo Stick"?

This was the greatest night in history!

He and his gal Gloria were going to celebrate her birthday like millionaires. Ernie was working now!

Ernie thanked his puddle-jumping skill on a page stick for making this wonderful night possible. With his page stick he'd earned a fancy fee doubling for the star in the filming of a slapstick TV comedy.

The front door opened, and J. Allan Stanley's booming voice greeted Ernie jovially. J. Allan was the producer of the TV film Ernie was working in.

Ernie let out a bleat like a lost lamb. J. Allan, a plush-looking gent in rough tweeds, stood inside the door, holding an oversized baby's gown, a bonnet, underwater-vision goggles, and the webbed rubber flappers such as the frogmen used in the war.

"No!" Ernie cried, "Not a retake! Not now! I've got a date!"

"The date waits!" J. Allan said flatly.

"The sequence we took of you didn't turn out right. We're doing it over."

Pleas were useless. J. Allan was not the sympathetic type. So Ernie, feeling like he was getting dressed for his funeral, shed his lovely dove-gray dinner jacket and got into the baby's gown with the freak accessories.

"We'll take some town shots," J. Allan said, "with you in traffic and jumping open manholes. Then we'll go out Cypress Street—"

"Not Cypress!" Ernie moaned. "Gloria lives on Cypress!"

"Out Cypress," J. Allan repeated, "to Fresh Pond Road, where you can take a dunker into the pond."

J. Allan drove Ernie to Main Street where the camera crew was waiting. While the police kept the crowds on the sidewalks. Ernie put on the bonnet and the goggles. and with the webbed flappers adorning his feet, he dolefully took off on his pogo stick, leaping and thumping up and down the street like a kangaroo.

The cameramen took long shots and angles and close-ups. Ernie madly pogo'd ahead of the speeding cars, jumped over midget autos, barely missed open hanholes, and was chased by comedy cops. J. Allan was a perfectionist, and they did scenes over and over. Ernie felt like a monkey on a stick. The world could come to an end, for all he cared. By the time they headed out Cypress Street, Ernie wished he would take a noser into an open manhole and never come up.

The cameras were taking long shots when they went past Gloria's house. Ernie hoped that she was upstairs crying her eyes out, so she wouldn't see him. But no sooner were they by the house than Gloria's red convertible shot out of the driveway like a fire engine answering a fifth alarm.

Ernie pogo'd as though he were fleeing from an atom bomb, but the convertible purred up alongside him.

"You- You-" Gloria cried.

A breeze ruffled her golden hair. She was merely gorgeous in an off-the-shoulder of baby blue.

"We're doing a retake," Ernie said feebly.

"ON MY BIRTHDAY!" Gloria protested.
"A nasty old retake on MY birthday! Why didn't you tell them?"

"Darling," Ernie pleaded, "you don't TELL the goose that lays the golden egg."

Ernie took his hands off the pogo stick to emphasize his point.

KER-PLOP-P-P! He took a belly-whopper in a puddle of juicy mud!

When he raised up, he was mud from head to foot. The cameras were grinding.

J. Allan was eagerly motioning him to get aboard his pogo stick.

"Ooooh-h! Look at you!"

Gloria burst out crying. Ernie wanted to crawl back in the mud and quietly suffocate.

Wearily, Emie mounted his pogo stick, leaving a trail of mud as he continued his kangaroo hop. All the way to Fresh Pond, Gloria kept saying that she never wanted to see him again.

lce was on the pond, and Ernie selected a spot for his header where it looked thick. When she saw him with his noggin folded up like an accordian, she'd be sorry.

C-CR-RACK-K! Leaping over his pogo stick, Ernie went headfirst through the ice. His head felt as though it had exploded. He came up where the ice was still over him. It was nice and cozy in this watery grave. He was going to stay here forever.

The ice was splitting above him. The camera crew were breaking it up. Ernie's head bobbed into frosty air.

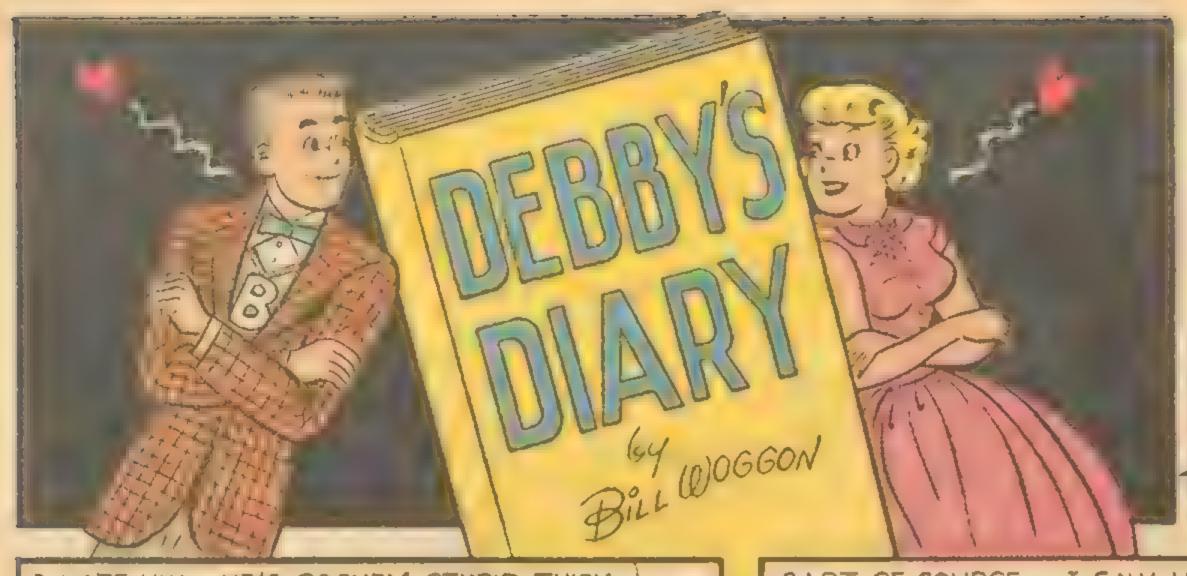

"Ernie-pie! Ernie-pie!" Gloria was shouting. "I'm on film! J. Allan's leaving me in! He's going to write a part for me! I'm a TV actress!"

They dragged Ernie from the pond. He looked like a drowned pup.

"Oh, what a wonderful birthday present!"
Gloria chattered on. "Kiss me, honey, but don't splatter me."

Ernie must have been grounded. Because Gloria's lips on his were like an electric shock.

it's a hard road from the ridiculous to the sublime, but it's heaven when you get there.

Dear Diary.
I'm through with Bart butforever butdef I never butbant to see him again.
